Spring Registration Approaches

Spring 2017 registration begins in November. Here are a few things to remember and take care of prior to registering:

- Talk to your advisor early; avoid the last-minute rush.
- Look over your progress report before making your schedule. Check for GEs, graduation requirements, major requirements.
- Clear up any holds from the library, registrar, etc.
- Double check pre-requisites to ensure you are eligible to take the class.

Seminars

PSIR is offering three seminars next spring:

- POL 401: Seminar in American Government and Politics.
- LAM 493: LACS Capstone Seminar

Both seminars fulfill the seminar requirement in Political Science or International Relations. A full description for next semester’s topics can be found on page 2 of this newsletter.

- POL 390: The Junior Seminar.

Are you a junior or sophomore who wants some seminar experience prior to your senior seminar? This one is for you. A full description of the topic can be found on page 2 of this newsletter.

You must email Jeff Miller (millerj@newpaltz.edu) to reserve a place in these seminars.
Spring Seminar Notes

POL 401 Seminar in American Government and Politics
Topic: Public Policy and Inequality
Instructor: Scott Minkoff

Inequality is a problem with deep historical roots and contemporary salience. This senior seminar takes on this much discussed topic of inequality in America by focusing on empirical research that examines public policy as both a source of inequality and a solution. As a class, we will examine inequality in the health care system, in our educational system, in our economic system, and in our criminal justice system. We will read and discuss empirical research that seeks to explain where these policy inequities come from, what their consequences are, and when and how government has sought to address them. Students will pursue their own research project on a topic that interests them related to policy and inequality.

LAM 493 LACS Capstone Seminar
Topic: Crime and Violence in Latin America
Instructor: Phillip Mauceri

An ongoing challenge Latin American countries have faced in the last several decades is a high level of crime and violence, as countries of the region worked to extend and deepen democratization. This course will explore how key actors have attempted to balance efforts at countering violence carried out by criminal groups, para-state and state actors while at the same time ensuring the security and human rights of its citizens. Special attention will be paid to the sources of violence, such as organized crime, gang violence, drug trafficking and military/police violence, as well as the role of civil society groups and governments in advancing democratic norms and practices in the midst of violence. This Capstone Seminar is designed to demonstrate the knowledge and skills acquired in your major field in an original research project, subject to the professor’s approval. The question you choose to address in your research project must be directly related to the topic and issues of this class. The culmination of this capstone course will be a research paper of approximately 20 pages, and the presentation of your research and findings to the Capstone Seminar and the Symposium at the end of the semester.

POL 390 Junior Seminar in Political Science
Topic: Inter-institutional Relationships in American Government
Instructor: Nancy Kassop

Public attention focuses most often on the relationship between Congress and the president, since these are the two branches in the American governmental system where we are most likely to look for national policy-making. But there is an intricate dance that exists in this system - and each of the three branches is engaged in ongoing relationships with the other two. This course will examine the relationships between pairs of branches in American government: 1) the president and Congress; 2) the president and the Supreme Court; and 3) Congress and the Supreme Court. We will look at the respective constitutional responsibilities and the political interactions within each pairing. Readings will come from scholarly research and primary sources.
